Cretaceous Dawn uses time travel through a graviton vault in a particle physics lab to send its characters four people and a German shepherd from modernday Creekbend, S.D., to the same location 65 million years in the past. Beginning on the white sands of a tooidyllic beach, the characters, and the reader, embark on a thousandmile trek from the Epicontinental Sea to the foothills of the infant Rocky Mountains. During two months of travel by river and over land, the survivors encounter a host of Cretaceous vegetation, dinosaurs, mammals, reptiles, and of course terrain, all vastly different from those of the modern South Dakota and Montana. And while they are struggling on in the past, presentday investigators, led by Creekbend's female police chief, attempt to solve the mystery of an empty, damaged lab empty, that is, except for the lower half of a human body.
